

The Iroquois Native Americans

Written By: Kambree Calkins

Their Home Land

The Iroquois Native Americans used to live in the eastern part of New York State but moved to Canada in the 1700's.

Their Shelter

The shelter for the Iroquois Native Americans were longhouses. The longhouses held as many as sixty people. The Native Americans built the longhouses with large wood frame's covered with elm bark.

What They Wore

The men wore breech cloths with long leggings under their breech cloths. The women wore wraparound skirts and shorter leggings under their skirts. The woman made all of the clothing they wore from the animal skins they scraped.

What They Ate

For food the Native Americans ate deer, elk, antelope, moose, bear, buffalo and fish that the male Native Americans hunted. The woman picked wild plants, berries, nuts, corn, squash, beans and pumpkin seeds and other different kinds of crops.

What They Used For Tools

The Native Americans used animal bones for cutting, sewing, digging, fishing and scraping animal skins.

What They Used To Hunt

The male Native Americans used bow and arrows, clubs and shields to hunt. For fishing they used spears and fishing poles that they made.

My Conclusion

I learned that Iroquois Native Americans ate different things and lived a lot different than what we do. The Native Americans were always doing chores or helping out.
